Exclusion of Youth Granted “Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals” from Affordable Health Care

PART 1: RESTRICTED ACCESS TO HEALTH CARE

What are the health care restrictions released by the Obama administration on August 28, 2012?

The Obama administration released two official policy announcements on August 28, 2012, that affect the eligibility for federal health care programs of individuals granted deferred action under the administration’s “deferred action for childhood arrivals” (DACA) policy. The policies announced on August 28 — issued as federal regulations and guidance — do not affect any other immigration category and do not affect individuals granted deferred action apart from the DACA policy.

The announcement changes federal rules for DACA-eligible individuals by excluding them from affordable health insurance options that are available to other individuals with deferred action. See below for more details.

Before the changes announced on August 28, some DACA-eligible individuals would have gained access to more options for affordable and comprehensive health insurance. Youth granted DACA who are under 21 years of age or pregnant and who are otherwise eligible would have been able to apply for free or low-cost health insurance through a state’s Medicaid program or Children’s Health Insurance Program (CHIP) in about half of the states. In some states, pregnant women will continue to have access to federal health insurance coverage under CHIP regardless of their immigration status.¹

After 2014, DACA-eligible individuals would have had additional options to buy affordable health insurance in their state as a result of federal health care reform. (The health care reform law’s name is the Affordable Care Act (ACA). Sometimes it is referred to as “Obamacare.”)

As a result of the August 28 changes, DACA-eligible individuals will remain excluded from almost all affordable health insurance options. They will be treated as though they are undocumented, even though they are otherwise considered lawfully present and are eligible for a work permit and a Social Security number. Unless their state has established a state-funded health coverage program, their only opportunity to obtain affordable, comprehensive health insurance may be through employment.

When do the restrictions go into effect?

The restrictions are effective August 30, 2012. The restrictions apply to every DACA-eligible individual effective immediately.

What do people granted deferred action outside of DACA have access to in terms of health care?

People granted “non-DACA” deferred action:

- Enroll in low-cost, comprehensive health insurance available through Medicaid or CHIP in about half the states, if they are under age 21 or pregnant. See below for more details.
- Enroll in a state’s high-risk insurance pool, referred to as the Pre-Existing Condition Insurance Plan (PCIP). This allows U.S. citizens and lawfully present immigrants who are currently uninsured and cannot get health insurance because they have a particular medical condition (such as cancer, high blood pressure, diabetes, depression) to buy more affordable health insurance.

AFTER January 1, 2014, people with non-DACA deferred action status:

- Can buy private, comprehensive health insurance if health insurance is not available to them through their school or work. This new way of buying health insurance under federal health care reform is often referred to as the “health insurance marketplace,” although the marketplace may have a unique name in each state, such as “Covered California” or the “New York State of Health.” Open enrollment in the marketplace for coverage in 2014 starts October 1, 2013, and ends March 31, 2014. Undocumented people are not eligible to buy health insurance inside the marketplace.
- Can apply for financial assistance to pay for the private health insurance purchased through the marketplace. The financial assistance will be provided in the form of federal refundable tax credits, known as “premium tax credits” and “cost-sharing reductions.” The amount of the tax credit will be based on income. As a result, the price of health insurance will vary based on an individual’s or family’s income, so it will be more affordable. See below for more information.
- Can enroll in a “Basic Health Program,” if their state has one, starting in 2015. The Basic Health Program will be another affordable health insurance option for low-income and working families.
- Will be required to have health insurance under the “individual mandate,” unless it is unaffordable or the person is eligible for an exemption.

What do DACA-eligible people have access to in terms of health insurance?

DACA-eligible individuals currently have the same access to health care and health insurance as undocumented immigrants. For example, individuals granted deferred action under the DACA policy:

- Cannot get comprehensive health insurance under Medicaid or CHIP in their state, unless the state has a separate, state-funded program or has elected the federal option to provide prenatal care regardless of the woman’s immigration status.
- Cannot apply for the high-risk insurance pool (the Pre-Existing Condition Insurance Plan, or PCIP), unless the state where they reside has a separate state-funded program.
- Cannot buy health insurance in the ACA’s health insurance marketplace, even at full cost.
- Are not eligible for federal tax credits to make private health insurance affordable (even if they are paying federal taxes) in the marketplace.
- Will not be required to have health insurance under the “individual mandate.”
- Will likely not be eligible for the Basic Health Program if their state has this program.
- Can buy full-price health insurance outside of the marketplace, if it is available.
- Can get health insurance through their employer, if it is available.

Do the DACA health care restrictions affect all individuals granted deferred action?

No. The restrictions apply only to individuals granted deferred action under the DACA policy and process. Individuals granted deferred action through other avenues will have access to all of the options for affordable health insurance discussed above.

What are the key policy concerns about the health care restrictions?

The key policy concerns are that the restrictions:

- Create an unnecessary distinction between individuals granted deferred action through DACA and individuals granted immigration relief through other discretionary remedies.
- Treat DACA individuals as different and “less than” other lawfully present immigrants.
- Further restrict access to health care for immigrants, especially children and pregnant women.
- Exclude DACA-eligible individuals from the main benefits of health care reform well before most of its programs are implemented.
- Embolden state lawmakers to discriminate against this group in providing services.
- Set a bad precedent for future DREAM Act or other immigration reform proposals to treat newly legalized immigrants as lower-class residents with fewer rights than most other lawfully present immigrants.
- Exacerbate the false myth that immigrants come to the U.S. to get health care or public benefits rather than for job opportunities and to reunite with family members.
- Deny the right to health care to the nation’s youth and future generations.

- Signal that it is preferable for lawmakers to make decisions that hurt real people for short-term political gain rather than do what's best for individuals and the country in the long term.
- Signal that health care reform and comprehensive immigration reform will continue to treat immigrants as second-class citizens.

How do the health care restrictions affect pregnant women who are granted deferred action through DACA?

In every state, undocumented pregnant women are able to deliver in any hospital. For women with very low incomes, the cost of that hospital visit may be paid for by the federal government through a special Medicaid program known as “emergency Medicaid.” However, in the majority of states, undocumented women are often unable to seek regular care (prenatal care) during their pregnancy. Without prenatal care, there is a greater chance of a high-risk birth, birth defects, and low birth weight. Undocumented women also find it difficult to seek medical attention after delivery (postpartum care), since emergency Medicaid does not cover services that are not related to labor and delivery. It's important to note that children born to women who have emergency Medicaid are automatically eligible for Medicaid.

Eligible pregnant women granted non-DACA deferred action are able to seek comprehensive medical care in almost half the states under the Medicaid and CHIP programs. After 2014, if they make too much money to be eligible for Medicaid or CHIP, they will be able to buy health insurance in the marketplace and receive tax credits to help pay for it.

By contrast, pregnant women granted deferred action through DACA will be limited, in most states, to health care coverage only for their labor and delivery (through emergency Medicaid). In some states they may be able to get prenatal care either through a state-funded program or the federal option to cover “unborn children” under CHIP.

Example A

In many states, a single, pregnant woman who is eligible for DACA will remain without access to prenatal or dental care and will not be able to see a regular doctor during her pregnancy to make sure that her pregnancy is going well. She will be able to deliver in the hospital as she can today, but she will not be able to get any follow-up care for herself after the pregnancy that can help her stay healthy for her newborn. Depending on where she lives, she may have access to prenatal, dental, and other medical care on a sliding-fee scale at community health centers and hospital clinics.

What are some examples of how this affects nonpregnant individuals granted deferred action through DACA?

Example B

A 15-year-old high school student wants to play sports but needs a physical to be eligible. He has asthma and also needs to see a dentist due to a severe toothache. Under these policies, he will remain uninsured and without a regular doctor to visit. His parents will continue to worry about his health and will need to save money to be able to get their son the care he needs now.

Example C

A teen who has a severe disability or chronic illness and needs special medical care may be able to seek medical treatment only in an emergency room when her condition worsens.

Example D

A 25-year-old DACA grantee working for an employer that does not offer health insurance to its employees seeks care in an emergency room and is told she has the early stages of breast cancer. She needs to buy health insurance that she can afford in order to get the medical treatment she immediately needs without incurring huge medical bills, and to seek treatment by a breast cancer specialist. Because she is not eligible for the marketplace or tax credits under the ACA, she remains uninsured and is unsure how she will pay for the care she needs.

What health care options do DACA-eligible and undocumented individuals have right now?

The following health-specific programs are available regardless of immigration status in all states:

- Emergency-room care.
- Community health centers and free clinics.
- Public and safety-net hospitals.
- Public health services (immunizations, treatment of communicable diseases such as tuberculosis, HIV, sexually transmitted diseases).
- Emergency treatment under emergency Medicaid, including labor and delivery for pregnancy.
- Hospital and community health center financial assistance programs (also known as “charity care”).

More options may be available in your state. Check with a local health care provider or immigrants’ rights or health advocacy group.

Can DACA-eligible individuals enroll in health insurance provided by an employer?

Yes. If an employer offers health insurance to its employees, an employee granted deferred action through the DACA process may enroll in it like any other employee.

What are the details of the policy announcements regarding the health care restrictions on DACA-eligible individuals?

ACA-related federal regulations

- Amends the definition of which immigrants are considered “lawfully present” for the high-risk pool (PCIP) by adding an exception for individuals granted deferred action through the DACA process. Individuals granted deferred action for other reasons will still be considered “lawfully present.”

- Issued as an interim final rule, effective August 30, 2012. A 60-day comment period ended October 29, 2012. Comments can be viewed at www.regulations.gov/#!docketDetail;D=CMS-2012-0138.
- Interim final rule adds exception for DACA to Title 45 of the Code of Federal Regulations section 152.2 (45 CFR § 152.2) definition of “lawfully present” for PCIP eligibility.
- Other ACA rules reference the definition of “lawfully present” at 45 CFR § 152.2.
- Final rule on eligibility for the health insurance marketplace references 45 CFR § 152.2 for definition of “lawfully present”; so DACA-eligible individuals are excluded from eligibility to enroll in the marketplace.
- Final rule on Health Premium Tax Credit references 45 CFR § 152.2 for definition of “lawfully present”; so DACA-eligible individuals are excluded from premium tax credits (also referred to as Advance Premium Tax Credit, or APTC).
- Final rule on Shared Responsibility Payment for Not Maintaining Minimum Essential Coverage and related exemptions references 45 CFR § 155.20, which references 45 CFR § 152.2; so DACA grantees are exempt from the individual mandate.
- Interim final rule indicates eligibility for cost-sharing reductions (CSR) will be the same as premium tax credits, as there is no rule on CSR yet.
- Proposed rule on Basic Health Program (BHP)² references 45 CFR § 152.2. Comments are due November 25, 2013.

- Letter from State Health Official/State Medicaid Director “Re: Individuals with Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals,” SHO #12-002, Aug. 28, 2012.³
- Excludes individuals granted deferred action through DACA who are under 21 years of age or pregnant from Medicaid and CHIP eligibility under the CHIPRA (Children’s Health Insurance Program Reauthorization Act of 2009) option. This affects such individuals in states that have elected to offer Medicaid and CHIP to a broad group of lawfully residing children and pregnant women (currently about half the states do so).
- In states that have elected the CHIP’s “unborn child” option, prenatal care will remain available without regard to the woman’s immigration status.
- See NILC’s “Medical Assistance Programs for Immigrants in Various States” table, available at www.nilc.org/medical-assistance-various-states/, for more information about how medical coverage varies in the states.

letter of July 1, 2010, “Re: Medicaid and CHIP Coverage of ‘Lawfully Residing’ Children and Pregnant Women.” SHO #10-006, CHIPRA #17.⁴

- Concludes that “[b]ecause the reasons that [the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, or DHS] offered for adopting the DACA process do not pertain to eligibility for Medicaid and CHIP, [the U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services] has determined that these benefits should not be extended as a result of DHS deferring action under DACA.”

PART 2: HEALTH CARE AND THE AFFORDABLE CARE ACT

What are Medicaid and CHIP, and how do they work?

Children under the age of 21 and pregnant women who are uninsured, low-income, and granted deferred action are eligible to enroll in a state’s Medicaid program or in its Children’s Health Insurance Program (CHIP). These two programs are often referred to in each state by other names — such as Peach Care (Georgia), or Healthy Families (California), or Child Health Plus (New York).

The goal of both the Medicaid and CHIP programs is to provide comprehensive health insurance that is free or low-cost for children and pregnant women. Medicaid is also available to seniors and persons with disabilities who are low-income. In some states Medicaid is available to other adults as well.

Under both programs, a family can choose a particular health insurance plan, choose a doctor who can speak their language and who is in their neighborhood, and can go to the doctor whenever they need to, even for a check-up, for free or for a small copayment. In addition, medications that a doctor prescribes, dental care, and vision care are also provided at little or no cost under these programs. Overall, these two programs allow children and other vulnerable individuals to be able to get medical care when they are ill without having to go to an emergency room, or get a regular check-up by a doctor so that an illness may be prevented or caught early before it gets worse — and without having to spend hundreds or thousands of dollars on medical care and accumulate huge medical bills that they’ll be paying the rest of their lives.

Under federal eligibility rules that have been in effect since February 2009, immigrant children and pregnant women granted deferred action are eligible for Medicaid and CHIP in about half the states. (See the “Health Care Coverage” maps available from NILC’s website to find out which states, specifically.⁵) Undocumented children are not eligible for Medicaid or CHIP except in Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, Washington, the District of Columbia, and some California counties.

What is the “health insurance marketplace, under the ACA?

In the U.S., having health insurance is the key to accessing health care. Health insurance is needed in order to see a doctor for regular care, get medications, and help pay for costly hospital bills. Individuals without health insurance are generally expected to pay full price for their medical care, and often hospitals and private doctor's offices turn people away if they don't have health insurance. Today you can get health insurance through an employer or from the government, if you meet certain rules; or you can buy private health insurance in the individual market.

However, under current rules, insurance companies can deny anyone who wants to buy insurance, can charge you more if you're a woman or based on where you live, can make you pay more for the same insurance coverage, and can cancel your insurance once you start to actually use it when you get sick.

When all its provisions take effect, the Affordable Care Act will prevent insurance companies from imposing these restrictions. In addition, the ACA is designed to help consumers buy affordable health insurance and understand what they are buying.

To do this, the ACA allows every state to create its own health insurance marketplace (or "exchange"). In general, each state will have its own marketplace and will refer to it under a name unique to that state, such as the Massachusetts Connector, Covered California, or New York State of Health. Each state will create a website where consumers can apply online for the health insurance plan they choose through the state's marketplace. Only if an insurance company agrees to follow the rules under the ACA will it be able to sell its insurance plan in the state's marketplace. This will make it easier for consumers to compare and choose between plans and pick the best one for their health needs and budget.

What are "premium tax credits" and "cost-sharing reductions" under the ACA?

The ACA provides financial assistance to consumers who buy health insurance through the marketplace. The financial assistance comes in the form of two types of tax credits that are based on a taxpayer's household income. "Premium tax credits" (also referred to as APTC) would help reduce the monthly or annual cost (the premiums you'd have to pay) of having health insurance. "Cost-sharing reductions" (also referred to as CSR) would help limit the amount one would need to pay in copayments, coinsurance, and deductibles (also referred to as cost-sharing) for doctor visits or medications.

These tax credits will be available only to those who buy private health insurance through the marketplace, who have household incomes below 400 percent of the federal poverty level, and who file federal taxes.

This FAQ will be updated as needed to reflect the most current information available.
